JOHNNY WONDER

A. Most of the sugar we eat comes from sugar cane and sugar beets. In making cane sugar, the long sugar cane stalks are shredded and the sweet juice is pressed out of them. The juice is boiled until crystals of sugar form. As the sugar is refined, it changes from sticky, dark brown "raw sugar" to a white, fine-grained sugar. The thick, brown syrup left after refining is molasses. Sugar is made from the big, white sugar beet roots in almost the same way. We can't tell from its looks or its taste whether the sugar we eat is cane sugar or beet sugar.
